This Level 1 Digital Technologies course introduces students to the foundations of database design, programming, and digital outcome development, building essential skills for further study in Technology and NCEA. Students will learn to design and create simple databases that store, organise, and retrieve information effectively; develop basic programs using sequence, selection, and iteration to solve real-world problems; and create purposeful digital outcomes that respond to user needs. The course emphasises problem-solving, logical thinking, usability, testing and debugging, and responsible digital practice, including data privacy and ethical use of technology in Aotearoa New Zealand contexts. Through practical, project-based learning, students will gain confidence in designing, developing, and evaluating digital solutions while building a strong foundation for Level 2 and 3 Digital Technologies pathways and future technology-related careers.
